

I am completely against any cable or phone company being able to gain, maintain, or derive complete control over Internet access. In the spirit of competition -- an American tradition -- consumers should be able to chose any ISP that they would like. I am very happy with my Internet service provider, and I resent the fact that someone else may, at some point in the future, tell me I have to purchase service from a particular company just because of my address. Obviously this is about larger corporations making as much money as possible -- corporate greed -- and does nothing for the consumer, small businesses, or workers across the United States.
